Man and the Hereafter.

Any one who has followed the ored paper and bound in beautiful colcourse of practical religious thought during the last few years cannot have failed to recognize the gradual lessening of emphasis upon the resurrection both of Jesus and of men. Even hymns that speak about heaven are reserved for funerals. There has grown up a habit of treating all matters pertaining to life after death by way of allussion. We are told that the resurrection is present in the higher life, the moral uplift in human hearts. That liss thy we have trouble in our praching. That is why we have preferred to turn our ministers into entertaincers rather than to keep them prophets. Sisten to ethical prachers unless hey are "interesting." A morality that hesitates to speak of heaven and hell is a very delicate, heetic mether of saints. You cannot get a man to be good on general principles. He wants. itates to speak of heaven and hell is a very delicate, hectic mether of saints. You cannot get a man to be good on general principles. He wants to know something definite as to the outcome of his career. For practical purposes if there is no hell we must lavent one; if there is no heaven we must invent that, too.
