Plant lice, like most insects, have certain natural enemies that tend to keep them in check. Prominent among these are the parasitic and predaceous creatures, resembling wasps, which usually lay their eggs upon the lice. These eggs hatch into small maggots, which enter the bodies of the lice, where they feed upon the body juices until they are full grown. They then ransform to pupae within the body their host, from which they finally merge by cutting a round hole through the body of the louse. Close examina-tion of a colony of most any louse will of individuals which have mbed to parasitism. The preda-ce is insects live by actually feeding upon the lice. The ladybirds or ladygs are, by far, the most important ctors in the destruction of plant lice, as both the adults and young feed ravenously upon them. There is a notion
