City, School & Hospital Elections Called Filing Deadline Friday, February 12

A large number of friends and customers attended Maggie Marshall's retirement reception Monday. You will be missed, Maggie. I have enjoyed our interaction over the years.

— cwe —
We have had some nice weather these past few days; it's a shame they do not fall on the days I can be out in the yard cleaning up the limbs.

— cwe —
Track, Tennis and Golf start in February. I called for schedules, but have not received them yet.

— cwe —
I failed to report the rain measurement last week. I will report later.

— cwe —
Rain was predicted in the Wheeler area on Saturday, but it did not happen. We did have rain in OKC early in the morning.

— cwe —
We played cards again Saturday evening. William was in OKC and came by for three games. Jennifer and I won two; William and Jennifer won one.

STORM REPORT

As Reported by...
Stormie Meriwether,
Eleventh Grade Student

Dear Friends, When we were in OKC we had to go to Walmart. My dad was looking for something and I went with him. He said he will never do that again! We hunted all over the store. When we finally found where it was supposed to be, they were sold out. He said, "Well, that's my luck." We found something else we needed and went to the check out. All the lines were full. I took him to the self check-out. The line was longer but it moved faster. My dad does not like shopping at Walmart. That is the reason we all need

It is Sunday. In our culture Sunday is typically considered the day of the week for rest, relaxation, and/or refreshment. It is my least favorite day of the week. Sunday morning is nice, but not long after the clock hits noon on Sunday (and the trigger point seems to be creeping forward as the years go on), I tend to see the afternoon vanishing before my eyes, with the passing of each hour signifying the extinguishing of the opportunity for rest or relaxation. And the anxiety this produces is enhanced by whatever degree sufficient rest or relaxation was not achieved or experienced. It may appear that anxiety is too

The problem I alluded to in the preceding paragraph essentially pertains to the burdens of the work week creeping into the supposed day of rest on Sunday, into the afternoon and evening. Perhaps that illustrates my failure to maintain adequate boundaries in my schedule, or in my psyche. But I know without a doubt I am not alone in experiencing such a feeling, and so I make the claim: there is not a more desperate point of time in the week than Sunday evening.

Who doesn't feel as though the day off is over and gone, even before the clock says it is? And even if in reality the day is not gone, if it feels that way, what good is the remaining portion of the day? In what manner is it useful if it feels as though it has vaporized? I recently read the teaching of an instructor who claimed essentially that if something is forgotten, it no longer exists. This is not literally true, but the effect is the same as though it were. So it is, at least for me, with the hours of Sunday afternoons. They contain the heavy expectation of attaining the most elusive of objects of all - rest and refreshment. And if such are not attained, it produces the anxiety associated with having missed one's opportunity, knowing the opportunity may not present itself for some time.

The reality is, though, that there are opportunities that present themselves throughout the week, and, if they fail to present themselves with the grandeur that makes them obvious, they can still be made, carved out of the space that comprises a week, or a day, or an hour. Perhaps that is why the other days of the week seem more favorable to me than Sunday - the gifts are there to be claimed, but attention must be paid in order to see them, or action must be taken in order to claim them, whereas maybe my attitude on Sunday is that such gifts are supposed to more or less fall into my lap. Not many things happen that way. So maybe Sundays play by the same rules as the other days, and it is I who do not. Therefore the folly is my own, not the structure within which I find myself. That itself is a pleasant discovery - if the folly is mine, the remedy can also be mine, although the knots I continue to put on my head testify to the slow pace with which I learn to correct my mistakes. Well, I must wait a week to put my new viewpoint regarding Sundays to the test. There is some Sunday remaining and available to me now, and even if there weren't, man always, at every moment, has an opportunity to start fresh or with a new perspective. But Sunday is supposed to be a day of rest, so I have decided to wait until next week to put these musings to the test.
