Merely Mustard

I read something that an author had written, recommending that we get in to the habit of quitting things. This author said that he quit something each week. I think Thursday was the day all this quitting occurred for him. It sounds like a bit of a shocking idea. But life is continuously in flux and people and things change. If one is fortunate enough to find True North, just about everything else can be negotiable. And True North helps reveal what is essential and irreplaceable, along with what is and isn’t possible to be carried along on the trail. Even though something was of use and even needed at a prior mile marker, perhaps it can be set aside and left for another hiker to pick up when they have reached the appropriate stage of their journey. The author didn’t say it quite like that, but I think the sentiment is applicable. And like poetry, prose can be interpreted and applied in a number of ways.
